Conflicts That Make Us Who We Are, shows that most of them stem from the same root cause: the clash of independence and interdependence. All of us have two sides to our selves: an independent side that wants to be separate, unique, and in control; and an interdependent that wants to be connected, similar, and cooperative.

And so most of my work eventually focuses on cross-cultural issues. Clash! is a wonderful book - a must-read book. The sub-title says it all - the authors have identified the most frequent "cultural conflicts", i.e. communication challenges that we run into on an almost daily basis. They write in a clear, easy-to-grasp
